Transcript

Contrary to popular opinion frogs aren't just selective eaters feasting only on flies. Take the Bullfrog for example they'll eat spiders, scorpions, rodents, snakes, fish and just about anything else that passes in front of them. But how do they manage to be such eating machines.

Bullfrogs don't have big claws, sharp beaks or fangs. Yet they overcome pincers, poisons and spicy stingers. With a mouth as big as the great outdoors. Ready to swallow just about anything. They have been know to swim 20 feet to shore and hop an additional 15 to 20 feet to grab a meal, turn around and hop back into the pond.

They have even been know to stalk birds like a lion on the prowl; eating them wing, beak and all. And they don't stop at their feathered friends. And they don't stop at their feathered friends. They will even eat each other. A small bullfrog that doesn't watch its step can easily become food for a bigger frog. They are quite cannibalistic.

A young bullfrog must quickly learn one simple froggy fact, eat whatever it wants, just don't end up on someone else's menu.
